When One Pathway Changes Another

I took a little time one recent Saturday afternoon to visit a local business owner. I'd seen something that made me wonder how his tackle shop was doing. It hasn't exactly been an ordinary Central Oregon summer. Less-than-ideal snowpack. Long stretches of heat without rain. Wildfires surrounding our community. Lakes dropping. Plans changing.

Standing there talking, I started thinking about how one pathway can alter so many others. A winter without enough snow can become a lake with less water. That can change where someone fishes, camps or spends a day or week. Fewer trips can mean fewer stops for fuel, lunch, groceries or supplies. The pathway keeps moving. But then my friend said something I wasn't expecting. Sure, he told me, the lakes are down. Algae is growing in places. "But where there's water movement, there's still GREAT fishing."

Then he smiled and told me why he still enjoys coming to his shop each day. He never knows who might walk through the door—or what he might learn from them that day. That stayed with me. Here I was thinking about everything happening to his business. He was thinking about the people who might still walk into it. A business can be part of someone's pathway without knowing they're coming. And when that door opens, something can be exchanged besides money—a fishing report, a story, a little knowledge, maybe just a good conversation.

Sometimes the pathway changes. That doesn't mean there isn't still somewhere worth going.

A highway worker was given the job of painting white lines down the middle of the main road out of town. On his first day he painted six miles. The next day he painted three more miles. But the following day, he painted less than a mile. When his foreman asked him why he kept painting less each day, the worker replied, "I'm sorry boss. I just can't do any better. Every day I keep getting father away from the paint can!"

Just A Typical Day Getting The Kids To School On Time!

Why is it on those mornings when you oversleep and have 15 minutes to get the kids to school, nothing seems to go right?

I recall one morning in particular when this happened. I found myself racing to my kids' bedrooms. Pausing briefly in each doorway, I tenderly smiled upon their sleepy innocence, then lovingly yanked off the covers and whispered, "Get up and get out of bed! You're late for school!"

Trusting them to dress themselves, I hurried to the kitchen to burn, I mean, cook breakfast. After five minutes and two more announcements, though, I still didn't hear the sounds of busy little feet scurrying to get dressed.

"You'd better be out of bed," I warned as I returned to check on their progress. They were out of bed all right but had fallen back to sleep in the shirt drawer. "You have exactly two minutes to dress and eat," I ordered, "I'll be waiting for you in the car."

"You're not taking us to school like that, are you?" questioned my oldest son, Rusty.

"No one will see me," I assured him, repinning a curler.

"But there's green crude on your face."

"It's not crud. It's an herbal mask. I don't have time to take it off. Hurry!"

Grabbing the keys off the table, I went outside to start warming the car.

Moments later, my middle son, Matthew appeared in the doorway.

"The Superman cape goes," I said, snatching it from his shoulders as he hopped into the car.

Rusty followed next and passed inspection.

Then Sally, the youngest, appeared, but looked taller than usual.

"Why are you wearing skates?" I inquired, glancing down at her feet.

"I can't find my shoes," she shrugged.

Biting my lip, I turned off the motor and ran back inside the house to look for her shoes, or for that matter, any shoes without wheels; but the only matching pair I could find were bronzed. While I contemplated cramming her feet into those, Matthew honked the car horn, signaling he'd found Sally's shoes under the front seat of the car.

At last, we were ready to go, and it was a race against the clock. We arrived at the school with only three minutes to spare. I quickly handed out lunch money and kisses, but by the time I got to the last child, I was 35¢ short.

Emptying my purse onto my lap turned up seven more pennies and the Sears catalog I had been looking for. A quick check in the ashtray netted another nickel and four rusted bobby pins. Hauling the carseats out onto the curb uncovered three more cents and a video game token.

"Why don't we just borrow the money from the principal?" Rusty suggested. "He's coming this way."

I quickly hid under the dashboard, hoping he'd think the kids drove themselves to school. But it didn't work. He knew I was there and wanted to know why the carseats were blocking the school bus. I quickly explained I was looking for lunch money. He graciously gave me the change I needed, then helped me put the seats back in the car.

Thanking him for his kindness, I sent the kids off to their classes and pulled away. All I wanted to do was go home. The sooner, the better. But I only made it as fas as the corner before running out of gas.

As I sat there stalled in the middle of the street, I wanted to cry, but the green crud on my face wouldn't give.

It was starting to rain now, and there was only one thing I could do. I had to gather up what little dignity I had left and start walking toward the nearest gas station.

But then again, you can only look just so dignified hauling a gas can down the main street of town in curlers and Mickey Mouse pajamas with the feet in them....and that green crud covering my face.

Tomorrow is a new day....I hope!!

As a 911 dispatcher, I speak to people in various states of panic. One day, a woman called saying that a family member had fallen and needed help.

"Do you know what caused the fall?" I asked.

"No," the woman nervously replied.

"What?"

My wife and I get along just great....except she's a backseat driver second to none. On my way home from work one day, my cellphone rang as I merged onto a freeway bypass. It was my wife. By chance, she'd entered the bypass right behind me.

"Honey," she said, "your turn signal is still on. And put your lights on...it's starting to rain."

One morning a man is woken by a knock at the door. He gets up and goes downstairs to open the door. To his horror, he is met by a six-foot-six-inch spider which immediately head-butts him, runs inside, tramples all over the man, kicks him in the back, kicks his ribs and stamps all over him. He wakes up in the hospital. Turning to the doctor he said, "I feel terrible. I am sore all over. What's wrong with me?" The doctor says, "I'm afraid there's a vicious bug going around."
